O artigo aborda o potencial emocional e engajamento que esses sites podem oferecer aos fãs do futebol nacional, destacando a variedade de dados disponíveis. Written evidence submitted by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations (NCVO) to the House of Commons Select Committee on Digital, Culture, Media and Sport's Inquiry into Online Harms. The purpose of this submission is to highlight key areas that NCVO would like to see addressed during consideration of its recommendations in relation to online harms for adult users and children. NCVO recognises the need to ensure that the internet can be a safe place to visit, socialise with others or consume content without fearing negative outcomes such as bullying, trolling, hate speech or harmful behaviour which may undermine wellbeing. We also acknowledge that there are significant benefits to being an active member of online communities and we do not want to see these opportunities diminished by draconian regulations on free expression. In this submission NCVO outlines the following: 1) The need for a clear, comprehensive regulatory framework with robust powers which can be applied in proportionate and consistent manner across all providers; 2) How the harms faced online are not confined to social media but also include other services such as e-commerce websites, search engines and gaming platforms. We recognise that these companies have a role to play alongside tech giants where appropriate; 3) The importance of having clear definitions which can be applied consistently across the sector with a focus on prevention in addition to regulating behaviours; 4) The need for adequate time and funding for enforcement agencies. We also recognise that digital platforms are complex and evolving spaces, therefore we believe that providers should have an obligation to engage with regulators when developing systems to prevent harms from occurring; and 5) NCVO does not support the concept of 'digital by default' but believes it is important that children can be confident in accessing a digital world. We do, however, acknowledge that this involves significant work for parents/carers as well as providers to ensure there are appropriate safeguards and age restrictions in place across all platforms. NCVO welcomes the Government's commitment to tackling online harms through establishing an independent regulator with a mandate to protect adult users, children under 18 years of age and vulnerable individuals. NCVO recognises that there is still much work to be done in relation to developing an appropriate regulatory framework which will provide the right level of protection for all online users. We would like to offer some key recommendations below: A clear, comprehensive legislative regime with robust powers should apply across all relevant online services and platforms (including social media companies), not just those that are categorised as 'social networks' or have over 5 million users. The regulatory framework must take a proportionate approach to ensure that the burdens placed on smaller organisations do not prevent them from operating while ensuring that large corporates can be held accountable for their actions; The definitions and guidance provided by Ofcom in relation to 'harm' should remain underpinned by established principles of human rights, children's rights and equality. NCVO recognises the need to address issues such as cyberbullying which has been shown to have significant impact on wellbeing Supported by: The National Council for Voluntary Organisations (NCVO) Date: 14th May 2019 [1] For more information please see NCVO's evidence in the House of Lords Select Committee Inquiry into Online Harms. Written evidence submitted by the National Council for Voluntary Organisations (NCVO) to the House of Commons Select Committee on Digital, Culture, Media and Sport's Inquiry into Online Harms. The purpose of this submission is to highlight key areas that NCVO would like to see addressed during consideration of its recommendations in relation to online harms for adult users and children. NCVO recognises the need to ensure that the internet can be a safe place to visit, socialise with others or consume content without fearing negative outcomes such as bullying, trolling, hate speech or harmful behaviour which may undermine wellbeing. We also acknowledge that there are significant benefits to being an active member of online communities and we do not want to see these opportunities diminished by draconian regulations on free expression. In this submission NCVO outlines the following: 1) The need for a clear, comprehensive regulatory framework with robust powers which can be applied in proportionate and consistent manner across all relevant online services and platforms (including social media companies), not just those that are categorised as 'social networks' or have over 5 million users. The regulatory framework must take a proportionate approach to ensure that the burdens placed on smaller organisations do not prevent them from operating while ensuring that large corporates can be held accountable for their actions; 2) A clear, comprehensive legislative regime with robust powers should apply across all relevant online services and platforms (including social media companies), not just those which are categorised as 'social networks' or have over 5 million users. This would ensure that there is a consistent regulatory framework in place to protect consumers; 3) The definitions and guidance provided by Ofcom in relation to 'harm' should remain underpinned by established principles of human rights, children's rights and equality. We recognise the need to address issues such as cyberbullying which have been shown to significantly impact on wellbeing; 4) There is a need for a clear definition or framework around the role of online platforms in relation to harmful content, especially where there may be conflicting interests between consumers and businesses; 5) The Government should commit to implementing an independent regulator with sufficient powers to deal with cases involving social media companies by 2021; 6) Any new regulatory regime must include a comprehensive system of enforcement which ensures that any penalties imposed are proportionate and effective. This would also help ensure consistency across the sector in how online harms are dealt with; 7) The Government should take care to ensure that any measures it takes to address harmful content do not undermine freedom of expression. In particular, a distinction between illegal activity such as terrorism or child sexual abuse and legitimate debate on matters which may be unpalatable should be maintained; 8) There is a need for the Government to explore how existing regulations could be adapted to protect consumers in an online environment while minimising any negative impacts that these changes would have on smaller organisations, such as charities. This must be done with a focus on ensuring fairness and equality of treatment; 9) A clear distinction needs to be made between the role of regulators (of platforms) and those responsible for content moderation in order to ensure consistency around what is considered harmful behaviour online; 10) The Government should consider whether it is appropriate that a body such as Ofcom, which already deals with broadcasting standards but not currently social media companies, has the responsibility of regulating these platforms. If this were to happen then there needs to be additional resources and powers for the new regulatory body in order for it to effectively fulfil its role; 11) There is a need to ensure that any online harm policy includes protections around free expression and privacy which will help safeguard charities from potential negative impacts of regulation on their ability to carry out their work. This should include: (a) Ensuring the regulatory framework recognises that public interest journalism is an important part of a healthy media environment; (b) Recognising that the free flow of information between individuals and organisations in society (including charities), including through social networking sites, is essential for democratic participation. It should be made clear that this does not include harmful or illegal content; (c) Making it a requirement of any online platform to clearly explain how they use and share user data in order to prevent organisations from being misled about their privacy rights; and 12) There is also a need for greater clarity on the role that platforms play in moderating harmful content, including: (a) The extent of powers required by regulator to effectively deal with harms arising out of such activity as well as how these will be enforced through penalties; and (b) How this may affect smaller charities which are unable to provide the same level of protection for their members or beneficiaries. The role played by platforms in moderating content raises difficult questions around free expression, censorship and who should have authority over what is considered harmful online material; it also has a significant impact on those organisations which seek to use such platforms as part of their work – including charities. Any new regulatory framework must carefully consider how the roles of social media companies in moderating content will affect free expression, privacy and civil liberties while taking into account that some forms of speech may be harmful or damaging; 13) The Government should also explore whether there is a role for existing bodies such as Ofcom to regulate online services. This would help ensure consistency across the regulatory framework which currently has separate sets of rules governing broadcast media, telecoms and social media companies. However, any move in this direction must recognise that different types of content have different impact on consumers and therefore require distinct approaches to moderation; 14) The Government should also consider how existing legal frameworks can be adapted or new ones put in place which would help regulate online services and protect consumers from harm. For example, there is a need for legislation relating to the liability of content hosts (platforms), who are currently not held accountable for illegal material hosted on their websites; 15) The Government should look at how existing legal frameworks can be applied more effectively in an online environment. In particular, it must consider whether current rules related to consumer protection and data security may apply as well as any necessary changes which need to be made so that they do not unduly impact smaller organisations like charities; 16) Any new regulatory regime for social media companies should also include a focus on improving the transparency of their moderation processes, including disclosure requirements. In order to enable this there is currently no requirement for platforms to disclose how they handle harmful content – or even what counts as harmful in practice; and 17) The Government needs to ensure that any measures it takes are proportionate so that smaller organisations (including charities) do not face an unreasonable burden. This will require a careful balance between protecting consumers from online harms while ensuring the industry does not become unduly constrained by rules which may have been created with larger corporates in mind; 18) Finally, there is also a need to look at whether existing mechanisms for regulating media companies can be adapted or new ones put in place. For example, the Government could consider how current regulatory frameworks relating to advertising and marketing of products and services (including those which target children) apply online; 19) The Government should work with stakeholders across the sector – including charities – on developing proposals for regulation that will effectively reduce harmful content while protecting free expression. In doing so, it must recognise that a one-size-fits-all approach to regulation is unlikely to be effective and may have unintended consequences; 20) The Government should also consider how its regulatory proposals could support the charitable sector’s work online by ensuring: (a) greater transparency in how platforms moderate content, including disclosing any criteria used for removal or restrictions on sharing of content as well as what counts as harmful and who makes these decisions; (b) improved access to information about the types of support that charities can seek when they have concerns about online harms; (c) greater protection from reputational damage resulting from unjustified censorship, including ensuring an effective appeal process where content is removed or restricted. The Government should also take steps to ensure that any regulatory regime for social media companies does not unduly burden smaller organisations such as charities who are unable to afford the same level of legal and compliance resources as large corporates; 21) The Government must recognise the valuable role played by civil society in helping shape policy around online harms. It should therefore consult with a wide range of stakeholders – including charities – on proposals for regulation to ensure that any new measures are fit for purpose and effective at reducing harm; 22) The Government must also recognise the important role played by technology companies in mitigating online harms. While it is ultimately their responsibility, they have a duty of care towards users which means they should work with regulators as well as other stakeholders to ensure that any new measures are effective and do not unduly burden charities; 23) Any regulatory regime must also consider how the needs of older people will be met. This includes: (a) providing clear information on online harms, including where they can seek help if they encounter them; (b) making sure that any changes in moderation processes do not make it more difficult for older people to access services and support offered by charities or other organisations through social media platforms; 24) The Government should also recognise the value of data as a tool for improving online safety. This includes: (a) how data can be used to identify trends in harmful content; (b) the potential benefits that could flow from greater use by charities and civil society organisations of the data which is generated on social media platforms; 25) The Government should also ensure a clear distinction between regulatory measures focused solely on curbing illegal behaviour – for example, child sexual abuse material or terrorism-related content – and those aimed at addressing harmful but legal activity such as cyberbullying. In the former case it may be appropriate to impose fines on social media companies (or other regulated bodies) which breach their duties under current laws; in the latter, there is a need for greater clarity over whether this represents an issue of consumer protection or free expression and what regulatory measures are most effective at reducing harm without unduly burdening charities; 26) The Government should also explore how it can work with technology companies to ensure that any new regulation does not stifle innovation in the sector. This could include: (a) exploring ways of ensuring that regulatory measures do not make it harder for small start-ups or charities to access platforms; (b) working to develop and promote best practice, including training on how social media companies can take action against harmful content without impacting the ability of smaller organisations such as charities to use these platforms effectively. 27) The Government should also consider whether new regulations could help tackle other types of online harms which are not currently covered by law or existing regulatory frameworks – including things like hate speech, false information and cyberbullying; 28) Finally, the Government must ensure that any measures it takes do not lead to an increase in costs for charities. This includes: (a) identifying the specific ways in which regulations could impact on smaller organisations such as charities – both directly (for example through increased compliance or reporting obligations) and indirectly; and (b) ensuring that any measures it takes are proportionate to achieve its aims, so as not to create undue burdens for the sector. This means taking into account: (a) the costs of complying with new regulations – including administrative processes such as record keeping or reporting requirements; (b) the impact on charities’ ability to fulfil their missions and reach beneficiaries, particularly if they are already stretched thin due to other commitments or existing regulatory obligations. 29) The Government should also consider how new regulations could be designed so as not to stifle innovation in the small start-ups or charities to access platforms; and (b) working with technology companies to develop best practices which enable them to take action against harmful content without impacting on smaller organisations such as charities. 96) The Government should also consider how new regulations could be designed so as not to stifle innovation in the sector. This includes: (a) exploring ways of ensuring that regulatory measures do not make it harder for small start-ups or charities to access platforms; and (b) working with technology companies to develop best practices which enable them to take action against harmful content without impacting on smaller organisations such as charities. 97) The Government should also consider how new regulations could be designed so as not to stifle innovation in the sector. This includes: (a) exploring ways of ensuring that regulatory measures do not make it harder for small start-ups or charities to access platforms; and (b) working with technology companies to develop best practices which enable them to take action against harmful content without impacting on smaller organisations such as charities. 98) The Government should also consider how new regulations could be designed so as not to stifle innovation in the sector.
