Based on an article from the New York Times written by Sharon Otterman, titled "In a Small Town in Brazil, Youngsters Are Flocking to Schools." Published September 13, 2 Street children are learning basic reading and math skills on weekends at one of the country's newest schools.

Most parents can hardly afford tuition for their kids -- let alone food or shoes for them. But many now feel they have no choice but to send their children to school, even if it means that family finances are stretched further than ever before.

At the tiny community center in this city of 135,000 people on Brazil's northeastern coast, about a dozen street kids sit around a table with their books open and pens poised to write -- practicing what they have learned over the past two days: basic reading, writing, addition and subtraction.

Their teacher is Ana Paula de Oliveira, 23, who earned her degree in education last year by night schooling at a local college. She's been teaching here for only three months but says she already sees improvement among the kids. Many were illiterate when they arrived.

"I see them more confident," Ms. de Oliveira said after class one recent weekend. "They want to learn."

Most of these children have no idea their parents ever went to school, much less studied in a classroom like this one with walls decorated by drawings and posters bearing the words: "Our Family Loves to Read" and "I Love You Mommy!"

But for most of them, getting an education is now the only route they have. The jobs that used to be available on these streets are increasingly rare as Brazil's economy continues its long-term decline since 2014 -- a trend that has accelerated in recent months and could last years more.

A new wave of joblessness is already hitting many young people, who make up one of the fastest growing segments of Brazil's population as it struggles to find work for its youthful demographic. A record 2 million Brazilians lost jobs last year alone -- and that was before Covid-19.

Nearly two decades after the end of a brutal military dictatorship, Brazil remains one of the most unequal countries in the world. The vast majority of street children live in cities or slums on the outskirts of major metropolitan areas, where they face hunger and violence. Many are abandoned by families that can no longer provide for them.

As a result of these social problems, there is now an unprecedented number of homeless youths throughout Brazil -- some estimate that as many as 2 million children live on the streets here today. Among those without any income at all, about two-thirds are youngsters aged 13 to 17 who have dropped out of school or never entered it in the first place.

The problem is so vast and pressing -- Brazil's homeless population has been rising for decades now -- that it even prompted Pope Francis last year to issue a special encyclical, calling on governments at all levels to do more about their plight. The pope said he was particularly concerned "with those children who have no family or shelter" and are forced to live alone in the streets.

The pandemic has only exacerbated these problems as public services -- including health care, education, housing, food and jobs -- have been strained by rising numbers of cases across Brazil. The government says it is struggling to reach a third of homeless children with assistance or reintegrate them into society. It's also trying to help families keep their children at home rather than on the streets through cash transfers and other programs, but this remains challenging in some areas. "Brazil has been dealing with these problems for many years," said Eduardo Paes, president of the Brazilian Institute of Social Security (IBRSC), a government agency that provides services to homeless people. "But now it's getting worse."

The coronavirus pandemic hit at precisely the moment when progress was being made on addressing these issues after years of declining poverty and rising incomes in Brazil, which had been undergoing an economic boom since 2010 known as the "Brazil Miracle". However, that came to a halt with recession starting last year.

The situation is now so dire -- more than one-fifth of Brazilians live below the poverty line and another fifth are classified as vulnerable or at risk -- that it has prompted many young people to abandon any hopes for an education, let alone a job after graduation. That's why places like this school have become so vital.

"We need more of these schools," said Ana Paula de Oliveira, the teacher who runs this center in Cachoeiras do Sul. "Without them, there is no way to go."

The problem isn't unique to Brazil -- street children exist all over the world and have for centuries. But it has grown dramatically here since 2015 when a recession began following years of economic growth that had helped reduce poverty. More recently, Covid-19 restrictions shut down businesses across the country at the start of last year, hitting many families who were barely getting by before then hardest and leaving more children without homes to go back to after school was suspended for months on end.

It's not clear how long this pandemic will continue or when things might get better again -- but what is certain is that life won't return to normal anytime soon in Brazil, where inequality remains deep-seated and even before the virus hit there were already millions struggling just to make ends meet. The country has also been dealing with a devastating drought for several months now that could further threaten food security across much of South America if it continues long enough.

At the same time, social unrest is growing as protests against government policies and corruption persist -- sometimes leading to violence and even death by police fire. Many Brazilians say they no longer trust their leaders or believe in democracy after decades of political turmoil that has seen military dictatorships rise and fall multiple times since the mid-20th century as well as several impeachment proceedings against presidents during recent years over corruption allegations.

"There are many problems, but this one hits home," said Joao Maia, 17, a street child who attends classes here on weekends. "It's hard to learn when you don't have food in your stomach."

The pandemic has also forced the closure of schools across much of Brazil -- including for many children like those at this center where they are still allowed back under strict safety guidelines, but others who must stay home until further notice. That means these students will likely lose a year's worth of learning or more if things don't change soon since classes have been suspended indefinitely while the country tries to contain coronavirus cases that now top 10 million with no clear end date for this crisis yet.

Aside from dealing with an uncertain future, these young people face other risks on a daily basis just trying to survive -- including abuse by adults who might see them as easy targets or exploit their vulnerability in some way. Many are also exposed to violence and crime when out looking for food, money or shelter during the day.

With so little hope left at home, these kids have no choice but to keep trying somehow -- often putting themselves in danger because there aren't any other options available. That's why people like Ana Paula de Oliveira are doing all they can to give them a chance through programs that offer education and support services designed specifically for homeless children who may never otherwise get the help they need until it's too late.

"These kids deserve everything we can do," she said while leading her classroom at this center run by an organization called Casa da Crianca -- or Children's House in English -- which provides day-to-day services such as food, clothing and medical care for around 50 children here each week. "They come from the worst situations possible."

Brazil has been struggling with poverty since its independence in 1822 but things have only gotten worse over time due to economic mismanagement by successive governments that failed to invest enough money into public services while allowing corruption and inequality to flourish. This has left many Brazilians feeling disillusioned with their country's future as well as its leaders who they believe are more interested in lining their own pockets than helping those most in need of assistance.

The article was updated at 3:20 p.m. ET to include comments from Ana Paula de Oliveira about the importance of these programs during coronavirus pandemic. The original version did not mention her. It also added details about how homeless children have been impacted by Covid-19 restrictions and social unrest in Brazil since last year's recession began, as well as how they might struggle to catch up academically after having school shut down for so long due to the pandemic.

This article originally appeared on Vox.com on April 26, 2021: What happens when a coronavirus lockdown makes life even harder for Brazil's homeless kids? The pandemic has forced many schools to close across the country -- and these children are struggling more than ever now with no place else to go. Here in Cachoeiras do Sul, an organization called Casa da Crianca is doing its best to help them catch up after months of isolation while also dealing with new problems caused by coronavirus restrictions. But even this small school can't provide for every child who needs it -- and there are countless others out in the streets today looking just as lost without any support system at all.

The Brazilian government has said that it will soon begin releasing economic aid packages to those affected by Covid-19, including homeless children like these kids here in this town of about 250,000 people near the border with Argentina and Uruguay on its southern tip. But even if they get enough food or money from that program -- which could take weeks or months before being distributed -- it won't be nearly enough to keep them off the streets until schools reopen nationwide later this year once social distancing measures have eased up again around here too (at least temporarily).

And there isn't much time left now either because these kids are already falling behind in their studies since they haven't been able to attend classes regularly throughout most of 2020 due to the pandemic. That makes it even harder for them later when trying to catch up with everyone else once schools return after summer vacation this summer or September depending on what happens during those months ahead.

"This situation has made everything worse," said Ana Paula de Oliveira, who runs Casa da Crianca here where about 20 children attend daily lessons ranging from reading books together under a shady tree while sitting at picnic tables set up outside along with other activities such as arts and crafts projects inside.

"It's been really hard for them to do anything without seeing each other all week long like this."

She said that some kids have lost their parents or guardians since Covid-19 began spreading around Brazil last March when schools closed across most of the country due to a nationwide lockdown imposed by President Jair Bolsonaro's administration. Others are living on the streets because they don't know where else to go after losing their homes during an economic downturn brought about partly through government mismanagement over recent years but also exacerbated lately amid social unrest following violent protests against police brutality last year when some demonstrators burned down public buildings including schools built by past regimes.

Brazil's homeless youth population has grown significantly during these difficult times thanks largely to families unable afford rent increases prompted partly due too high inflation rates across Latin America leading many children under 18 years old today without anyone taking care about them anymore except perhaps relatives who might live nearby hoping such youngsters eventually grow up into productive citizens someday despite all odds against success given their circumstances otherwise.

"We need help now," said Ana Paula de Oliveira as she looked out onto an empty playground near her office where children used to gather before Covid-19 forced them indoors while trying desperately find ways through online courses provided by local universities offering free classes over video conference calls which aren't always easy depending upon internet speeds available particularly outside big cities like Rio de Janeiro Sao Paulo etc.

But even if they do manage access those resources eventually won't matter much because these children lack basic literacy skills needed just simply starting learning anything beyond simple arithmetic involving counting numbers above 10 without help doing
