This equates to approximately 3 million tonnes of food being wasted each year by households (DEFRA, 2024). The economic impacts are significant and it is therefore important that this issue be addressed at multiple levels. At the consumer level there may be a number of reasons for why food waste occurs: inadequate storage facilities or appliances; lack of awareness about what can be done with leftover food; an absence of planning skills, which results in unplanned purchasing decisions and excess food at home. At the retail level there is also a range of reasons for why waste occurs: poor inventory management; over ordering as part of supply chain logistics or lacking knowledge about when products are close to their 'best before' date (although, this should not be confused with use-by dates). A key opportunity exists at the retailer and wholesaler level. Retailers have a responsibility both ethically and economically to reduce food waste by passing on information about surplus food to charitable organisations in their communities or other businesses that might need it such as local restaurants, cafés and hotels. The SDU supports the development of sustainable supply chains across all sectors. In partnership with WRAP we have developed a range of resources for retailers on how to reduce food waste throughout their operations including: 'Waste Not - A practical guide', which provides information about managing and reducing waste, and encourages businesses to work together through the Retail Forum; 'Sustainability Roadmap's' section that covers food waste management and reduction strategies for retailers. These resources help companies make better-informed decisions when it comes to minimising their contribution to food waste - but what about getting surplus food into the hands of those who need it? The SDU works in partnership with WRAP's Food Surplus Redistribution Network (FSRN) on a range of projects and initiatives designed to connect charities with retailers. These include: Retail Forum meetings where representatives from FSRN member companies and the SDU come together to discuss new opportunities for redistributing surplus food; 'Pick-It' events, which are free training sessions that enable FSRN members to learn about the regulations surrounding donations of surplus food (such as Hygiene Regulations); a network of retailers and suppliers working together through the Retail Forum who can share best practice on redistribution. The SDU is also involved in research into ways that we can improve our understanding of what happens to surplus food, which could help with the identification of gaps within this sector and opportunities for improvement (Wheeler et al., 2024). The study will examine how businesses manage their own waste; whether they are donating it or recycling it; who is taking the food away from them - charity organisations, other retailers, composting companies or landfill sites. In order to make progress on this issue we need a multi-agency approach involving all stakeholdits and government bodies working together in partnership to achieve our common goal: reducing food waste. In the UK there are currently over 20 charitable organisations that redistribute surplus food, which have been supported through FSRN membership since April 2024 (WRAP, 2024).
