The term “3 bet” has a tendency to cause confusion, especially amongst newer players. It frequently happens that a new player will assume that a “3 bet” is a raise roughly 3 times the size of the previous bet. It’s quite easy to see how this assumption arises.

Let’s first consider the correct definition of “3 bet”.

3 bet = The third bet in any given sequence of bets.

Watch Kara Scott Interview with Martin Jacobson on 3 betting:

The reason for the confusion is that when we 3 bet preflop it appears to actually be only the second bet in the sequence. A player open-raises, we decide to re-raise them. The reason why this is referred to as a 3 bet is because the mandatory SB and BB payments are referred to as the first bet in the sequence. Hence the open-raise is actually a “2bet”, while the re-raise is considered a 3 bet.

Because of this, confusion arises now regarding postflop 3 bets. Imagine our opponent fires a continuation bet on the flop and we check-raise. This is now clearly the 2nd bet in the sequence, but it gets commonly (yet mistakenly) referred to as a “3 bet” by many players. In order for an actual 3 bet to take place, our opponent must re-raise again over our check/raise in the given example.

Why 3 betting is Important

It doesn’t take a huge amount of statistical analysis to realise that 3 betting makes more money than cold-calling on average. The only reason we don’t 3 bet our entire continuing range preflop is that our opponents might adjust and begin to exploit us, when they realise we are 3 betting too aggressively. The idea is to get away with 3 betting as much as possible without our opponents being able to make exploitative adjustments.

To put it simply, we need to incorporate 3 betting into our poker strategy because it can provide a significant boost to our winrate.

Let’s take a look at some potential 3 betting ranges against opens from various positions.

3 betting on the Button

The button is a great place to 3 bet aggressively since, if we get called, we are always guaranteed to have position postflop.

Our 3 betting range will typically be divided into a selection of value-hands and a selection of bluffs. In most cases, it is correct to bluff slightly more than we value-3 bet. The effect of position on this should be noticeable – we can get away with a higher ratio of bluffs, assuming we have position.

The purpose of a value 3-bet is simply to get called by a decent selection of worse hands in order to make money. The purpose of a bluff 3 bet is to take the pot down preflop. We know that we usually do not have the best hand, but if our opponent sometimes folds, we can profit.

Usually, we don't bluff with any 2 cards. We pick hands that have potential to improve to a strong 5-card holding by the river. These hands will frequently have a nice combination of both playability and poker equity, maybe something like Axs for example.

We'll often find that it is common for our 3 bet bluffing hands to be slightly weaker than our cold-calling hands, although this is not always true.

3 bet BTN vs

In the following chart, our value-3bets are represented in light red while our bluff-3bets are represented in dark red.

Value 3bet range – 4.52%

Bluff 3bet range –

9.05%

Total 3bet range – 13.57%

Notice how there is a gap between the bluff 3 bets and value 3 bets. For example, holdings such as ATs. These holdings usually end up in our flatting range and are a little too strong for us to consider 3 bet bluffing.
